Email Client Testing Report

I tested my Summer Sale email campaign using Gmail, Outlook, and T-Online through the email testing tool. I compared how the layout, images, buttons, and interactive deal section worked in each email client.

What worked:

The main email layout displayed correctly. The hero image, background colors, product columns, icons, text, and buttons were properly aligned.

What didn't work:

The logo image did not load, so Gmail displayed the "Brand Name logo" alt text instead. I was also unable to confirm whether the interactive deal section worked from the preview.

Outlook

What worked:

The email container, colors, hero image, product columns, icons, buttons, and footer displayed correctly. The radio buttons and category buttons were also visible.

What didn't work:

The logo image did not load, and there was a large empty space below it. The selected deal description did not appear, so the interactive section did not fully work.

T-Online

What worked:

The hero image, background colors, product columns, icons, benefits section, and main button displayed correctly.

What didn't work:

The interactive deal section did not work correctly. The category labels lost their button styling and ran together on one line. All three deal descriptions appeared at the same time instead of only showing the selected offer.

Conclusion

The basic table-based layout worked well in all three email clients. However, the logo image and interactive CSS were not supported consistently. This shows why emails should use working online
